Mushroom farming grows on Waxia man

In the tiny Waxia community along La. 359 on a thousand square feet of the once mighty Holly Grove Plantation, an unlikely new food crop is being produced.

Mushrooms.

Not just any mushrooms, but gourmet oyster mushrooms.

Glenn Beard, the "son of a poor dirt farmer," is the force behind this modest expansion of agriculture in St. Landry parish.

Beard handles everything from preparing the mushroom fungus culture in Petri dishes, to growing, harvesting and marketing.

"I do it as a hobby and semi-commercial. I sell at the Red Stick Farmer's Market in Baton Rouge and a couple of restaurants," Beard said.

In addition to mushroom sales, his wife Emilie also markets a selection of peach, fig and blackberry jams and jellies.

It was experimentation with blackberry plant propagation that led to Beard's interest in mushrooms back in 1988.

He went to a seminar in Olympia, Washington, to learn more about the technical aspects and how to grow his own spawn.

Beard produces his spawn from a tiny, sterile piece of mushroom that will eventually develop into a branch-like mycelium that looks like, well, a fungus.

Working in front of a double filtered air blower, great care is taken to ensure that no air-borne contaminants pollute the agar solution where the mycelium grows.

When the culture has colonized the Petri dish it is mixed or "inoculated" into a clear, five-pound polypropylene bag of wheat seed and continues to expand. All of the tools must be alcohol sterilized; even the wheat seed growing medium must be sterilized in an oven at 250-degrees F.

The end result is mushroom spawn.

The spawn is then mixed into a larger bag of cottonseed bio-mass and transferred to a temperature and humidity controlled growing room designed to simulate the dank, humid conditions of the deep forest.

Inside the growing room, which is nothing more than a backyard shed, are several common two-by-four wood studs extending from floor to ceiling. Large nails hammered into the studs serve as hooks to hang the ten-pound bags of fungus-infested cottonseed.

Beard then uses a simple arrow-head mounted on a wood chock to puncture holes into the bags allowing the mycelium, which is exploding and expanding into hundreds of tiny white threads, to punch their way through the openings to the outer air.

When the "pins" emerge into the humid atmosphere of the growing room, they cling precariously to the outside of the bag, growing upon itself for about 10 to 14 days until it becomes a "flush" and reaches market size.

Beard said learning how to grow the spawn is one of the keys to profitable mushroom farming.

"If you don't know how to produce your own spawn, it's just too expensive to buy," Beard said.

His oyster mushrooms are a gourmet item for which he gets a gourmet price.

"The big boys cannot produce oyster mushrooms for the simple reason they don't have a long shelf life. They can't grow them in California and ship them here and still be good," Beard explained.

Beard is also experimenting with shiitake and pom-pom, or lion's mane, mushroom production.

After a career with AT&T and Marconi Communications, Beard retired in March 2002. His technical electronics background helped him with the all-important climate control in his growing room.

Beard said temperature control is important in all phases; if it gets too

Agriculture & Forestry Today with Commissioner Bob Odom

The state Bond Commission has approved the sale of $12 million in bonds to finance a maintenance phase of the Boll Weevil Eradication Program.

The $12 million in bond money will be used over five years and will be matched by equal funding from cotton farmers to continue the surveillance and monitoring of Louisiana cotton fields to ensure that the boll weevil does not resurface, Commissioner of Agriculture and Forestry Bob Odom said.

The farmers' matching $12 million will be financed by an annual $6 per acre charge, he added.

"We have finished the initial five-year eradication program in the western parishes and are in our final year in the eastern parishes. We have had excellent results in eliminating the boll weevil from Louisiana cotton," Odom said.

"The success of the program has meant a tremendous decrease in the amount of pesticides used to control the insect pest and a corresponding decrease in the cost to Louisiana cotton farmers to successfully harvest a crop."

Odom noted that state Sens. Robert Barham and Noble Ellington were instrumental in helping move the proposal through the Bond Commission.

"Louisiana Farmers should be heartened by the fact that the state of Louisiana leads the nation in its willingness to support its farmers during tough times," Barham said. "With the commitment of an additional $12 million to boll weevil eradication, Louisiana farmers have in place the financial backing to ensure that the eradication program for this costly pest stays on course."

Ellington agreed with Barham's sentiments.

"This money will go a long way in helping to continue the Boll Weevil Eradication Program, which has certainly been a great asset to Louisiana," he said. "Without the program, we would be in much worse shape in the cotton industry than we are today."

The maintenance program is designed to keep trappers patrolling cotton acreage on a continuing basis looking for any return of the boll weevil.

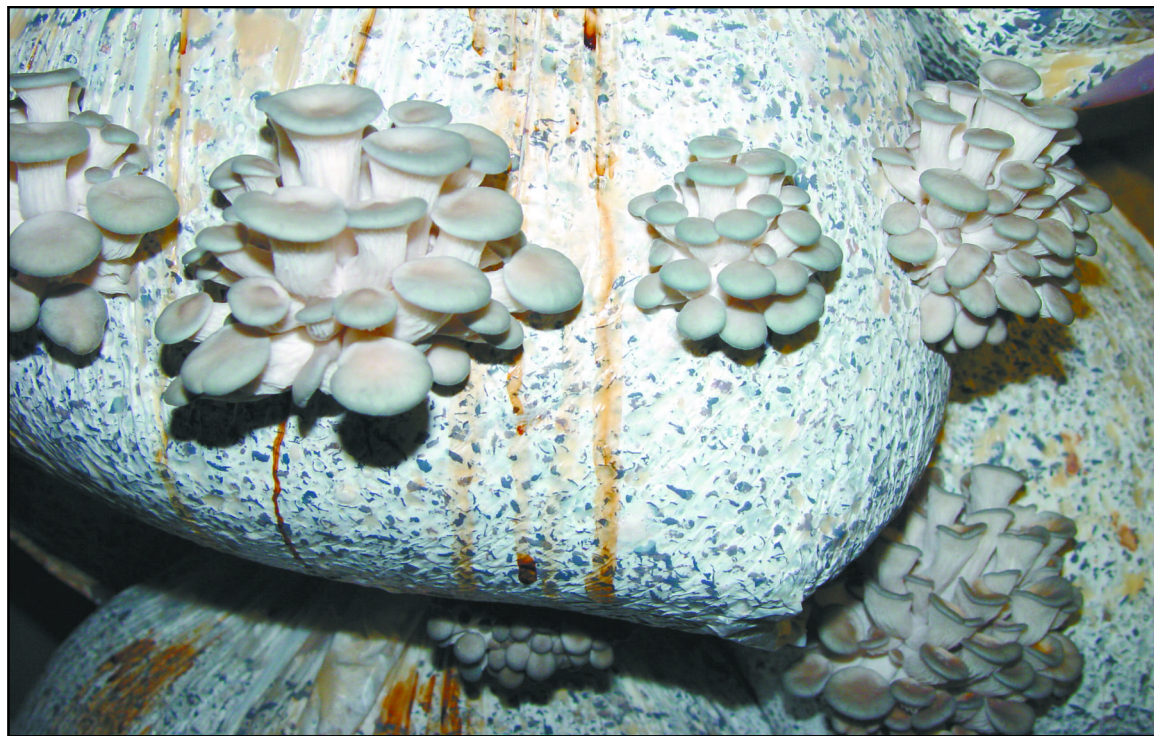

Before the program began nationwide in the 1980s, experts had classified the boll weevil as the single most costly and destructive insect found in any crop in American agriculture.

The eradication program began in the Atlantic coastal states in the late 1980s. Those states have been in maintenance programs for a number of years.

In addition to Louisiana, the nation's largest cotton states, Texas, Arkansas and Mississippi, are wrapping up the final stages of their five-year programs and are now beginning their long-term maintenance programs.

The boll weevil entered Texas from Mexico in 1892. By 1903, it had made its way to western Louisiana and in 1919 it arrived in North Carolina, making its sweep through the South complete.

high, the bio-mass destroys itself, too low and it won't grow.

Even though everything is done indoors, the unexpected pest can still devastate a crop.

"Little flies put me out of production for four weeks. They got in the bags and laid their larvae in the bio-mass and ate everything. I didn't realize they could multiply that fast," Beard observed.

"In mushroom farming you don't know what's going to set you back. It's still farming," he noted.

Still the benefits of being a mushroom farmer, retired from the humdrum of the corporate life, outweigh the negative.

"I don't have to set a clock anymore," Beard said.

"I go to bed when I want, get up when I want. I don't have airplanes to catch and I don't have to look at any more maps to find out where I'm going in the big cities."

"I'm here in Waxia, the center of the universe," he quipped.

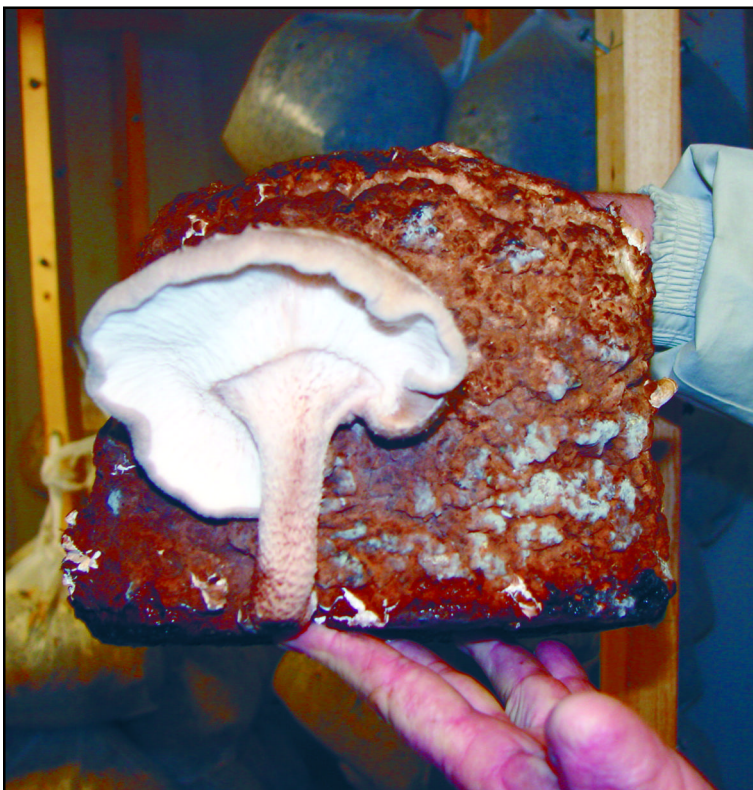

After hearing a quote from an agricultural web site that successful mushroom production involves "...experience plus an intuitive feel for the biological rhythms of the commercial mushroom," Beard replied, "Heck, I'm just an old country boy. I don't know anything about biological rhythms."

"The secret to mushroom farming is learning it the hard way, by trial and error," Beard said.

FROM SPORES TO FLUSH: MUSHROOM TERMINOLOGY 101

As long as they taste good in sauces, steaks and salads, the average mushroom consumer usually doesn't care about how the fungi grow. In fact, the terminology of mushroom farming can seem pretty exotic unless you've studied college-level botany. But for those with an interest in the origins of the food they eat, here are some of the common terms used in fungus cultivation.

- ♦ Spores – the microscopic, seed-like part of the mushroom
- ♦ Mycelium - a white, thread-like early growth of a fungus often seen on rotting wood or moldy bread. Grows from spores.
- ♦ Agar solution – an algae extract used to grow the mycelium culture in a Petri dish.
- ♦ Bio-mass – organic mass in which the mycelium or spawn grows. Can consist of wood chips, wheat straw, or various grains.
- ♦ Spawn – sterilized grain colonized by mycelium.
- ♦ Inoculation – introducing and mixing the spawn into the bio-mass.
- ♦ Pin – first growth of the fungus out of the bio-mass.
- ♦ Flush – full formation and development of mushroom growth to market size.

Mushroom pins begin to form a flush (clockwise from top left). After two weeks hanging in the growing room, oyster mushrooms are ready to be harvested. An arrowhead mounted on a block of wood is used to puncture the bags of bio-mass allowing the mycelium threads to punch through and begin growing on a polypropylene bag. Bio-mass material is sterilized in an oven at 250-degrees F. A chunk of hardened oak bio-mass is supporting Beard's experimental shiitake mushroom batch. Bags of cottonseed bio-mass hang from nails driven into standard 2x4s in Beard's climate controlled growing shed.

Florida announces new citrus canker quarantine areas in three counties

Florida Agriculture Commissioner Charles Bronson announced in February the establishment of quarantine zones in two counties and the expansion of another in a third, in an effort to halt the spread of citrus canker.

The quarantine zones are all in southern and western Florida. In Sarasota County, an approximately 4-square-mile area of Englewood, two miles north of the Charlotte/Sarasota county line, is being established following five positive residential citrus canker finds in October 2002. These are the first positive canker finds in Sarasota County, and to date, 514 residential trees have been destroyed with the homeowners' cooperation.

In Manatee County, a 16-square-mile commercial quarantine area is being established west of Duette, where citrus canker was confirmed on five grove trees in mid-January. These trees are in a previously uninfected section of a grove, which was quarantined for citrus canker from July 1999 to March 2002; all positive trees have been destroyed and exposed tree removal is in progress.

In Lee County, an additional square mile is being added to the northwest part of the 4-square-mile quarantine area established in December 2002, to account for additional residential finds just north of that zone.

"The establishment of these quarantine areas plays a vital role in reducing the spread of citrus canker," Bronson said. "We appreciate the cooperation of all citizens in these areas who assist us by not moving any citrus fruit or plant parts off their properties."

Bronson also said citizen cooperation is crucial to eradicating the bacterial plant disease and allowing the quarantines to be lifted. He points out that residents in Sun City Center in Hillsborough County and in the Palmetto area of Manatee County were able to have their quarantines lifted two years after their eradication programs concluded and are now replanting citrus. People within the quarantine area must now follow a few simple guidelines to help prevent the spread of citrus canker:

- Do not move citrus plant material in any form (fruit, leaves, stems, whole plants) from your property.

- Do not exchange dooryard citrus fruit with anyone (e.g., neighbors and relatives).

- Dispose of any citrus fruit peels, uneaten citrus fruit, citrus leaves or other citrus debris that are homegrown in a doubled plastic bag, and put out with other household garbage, not yard trash.

- Do not plant any new citrus in your yard. Potted citrus is also prohibited in quarantine zones.

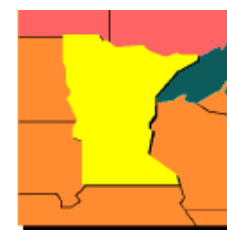

- Avoid touching (e.g., pruning, harvesting) your citrus trees during wet periods. Wash all harvested fruit and let air-dry. Practice good sanitation of hands and tools; antibacterial hand soaps and antiseptic gels are both good for disinfecting skin. Also, kitchen/bathroom disinfectants with quaternary ammonium chloride active ingredients are useful for equipment sanitation.

- Avoid fertilizing trees during the wet and warm season. Fertilize moderately during late summer/early fall.

- Residents can also help ensure that their lawn maintenance/landscaping provider is not inadvertently spreading citrus canker to their trees.

Lawn maintenance/landscaping companies working in a quarantine zone are required to be under a compliance agreement with the state, which outlines decontamination procedures. Residents should look for a colored decal in the driver's side windshield of the vehicle to confirm that their lawn service provider has signed the compliance agreement.

Minn. farmers receive disaster relief payments

The Minnesota Dept. of Agriculture announced that it has completed distribution of $3 million in state disaster relief payments to 2,888 farmers in 19 Minnesota counties affected by last summer's torrential rains and floods.

The state's $3 million disaster relief program was approved in a special legislative session in autumn 2002. The 19 eligible counties were Becker, Beltrami, Clay, Clearwater, Goodhue, Hubbard, Itasca, Kittson, Koochiching, Lake of the Woods, Mahanomen, Marshall, McLeod, Norman, Pennington, Polk, Red Lake, Roseau and Wright.

State payments went out to farmers who applied for state assistance after suffering yield losses of greater than 50 percent on their cropland. MDA received claims for approximately 1 million acres. Because the number of claims exceeded the $3 million legislative appropriation, it was necessary to prorate per-acre payments from the $4 per acre maximum payment down to $2.94 per acre.

Along with the recent passage of significant federal disaster assistance by Congress, this state aid will help affected farmers recover from the severe weather of summer 2002.

Firefighters search for shuttle debris near Dallas & Nacogdoches, Texas

Thirteen Louisiana Department of Agriculture and Forestry forest firefighters traveled to east Texas to aid in the search for Space Shuttle Columbia debris, Commissioner Bob Odom said recently.

"All of the state is pretty wet so we could spare a few of our firefighters to help NASA find the missing pieces of Space Shuttle Columbia that will complete the puzzle that caused this great tragedy," Odom said.

The 13 firefighters are: Jeff Anders, Minden; Bill Carpenter, Clinton; Allen Gayle, Gibsland; Wayne George, Converse; Buddy Graham, Natchitoches; Bret Lane, Zachary; Eugene Marcantel, Kinder; Wendell Marcantel, Dry Creek; Jason Rush, Deville; Shawn Sanders, Franklinton; Alan Small, Natchitoches; Mike Smith, Kentwood; and Joseph Willie, Folsom.

Small served as a strike team leader coordinating several 20-man crews searching for debris south of Dallas. The other 12 firefighters, led by crew boss Lane and crew boss trainee Carpenter, made up a 20-man team including eight U.S. Forest Service employees that searched near Nacogdoches, Texas.

The firefighters are trained for battling fires in extreme conditions and on rugged terrain, which was helpful during debris search shifts that lasted more than 12 hours at a time in thick brush, briars and mud.

Odom said the men have passed a "pack" test that requires them to carry a 45-pound pack for three miles in less than 45 minutes, proving they are physically fit for the assignment.

"I am proud of these young men and their commitment to help NASA locate shuttle debris. In volunteering for this mission, they pledged themselves to walking long hours through soggy, densely wooded areas they were not completely familiar with. It was definitely a challenge, but I knew they were up to it," Odom said.

Conservation funds available

Agriculture and Forestry Commissioner Bob Odom said funding to install conservation measures for farmland is now available through the USDA's Environmental Quality Incentives Program (EQIP).

"There are more than 50 conservation practices that farmers, livestock producers and other landowners can sign up for now," Odom said. "The program includes cost sharing assistance for fencing, pipedrops, ag waste facilities and underground irrigation pipelines, and these are just a few of the practices funding may be available for."

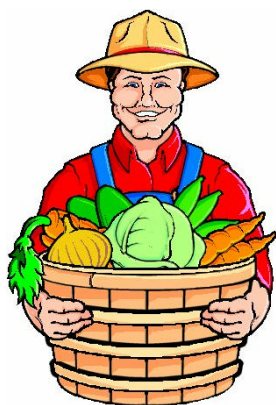

EQIP helps producers through cost sharing and incentive payments for the implementation of conservation practices. All EQIP activities must be carried out according to a conservation plan of operations developed by the producer and the National Resource Conservation Service, in cooperation with local soil and water conservation districts.

Beginning farmers and limited-resource farmers may be eligible for a greater cost-share rate than other producers.

"What this means is that if the local cost share rate for a conservation practice is 75 percent, when approved, producers would pay 25 percent of the cost for installing the conservation practice," said Don Gohmert, NRCS State Conservationist. "However, if the local cost share rate is 75 percent, beginning and limited resource farmers' cost share rate could be less than the 25 percent."

Incentive payments may be made to encourage a producer to adopt land management practices such as nutrient management, manure management, integrated pest management, irrigation water management and wildlife habitat management, or to develop a Conservation Nutrient Management Plan.

Interested parties should apply at their local USDA Service Center.

Prescription for ailing fields now available

Louisiana farmers have long been befuddled as to why bad spots often crop up in an otherwise high-yielding field.

A combination of new and old technologies now allows a producer to see where his trouble spots are located.

According to Drs. Roger Leonard and Ralph Bagwell, LSU AgCenter entomologists, yield monitors, along with overhead photos and other remote sensory devices, can identify low yield areas.

Leonard said Louisiana is at "the top of the curve" in using current global positioning, geographical information and other remote sensory technologies in creating an aerial prescription application system.

"Louisiana is among three states that have been able to demonstrate the feasibility of this technology today," Leonard said.

Speaking at the Louisiana Aerial Applicators Association meeting held at the Lafayette Hilton in February, Leonard said he and a team of scientists, software experts and pilots have built prototype equipment using current remote sensing technologies.

"Very detailed observations can be taken with harvesting equipment using yield monitors. Automated weather stations can transmit data hundreds of miles back to a central source and images from satellites can be used to measure potential plant growth patterns in fields and subsequently indicate yield potentials," Leonard said.

Stressed plants reflect sunlight differently from healthy ones so digital imagery could play an important role in the future of aerial application.

Dr. Roger Leonard

H e a l s o s a y s an aerial applicator could provide digital pictures and imagery of a field to a producer, who would evaluate the data with an agricultural consultant.

From there the consultant goes to the field and verifies the crop problem. The consultant then goes back to that producer and suggest a "prescription" to correct the problem.

A diagramed flight pattern, written by the producer, ag consultant or aerial applicator, telling the aircraft's spraying equipment what areas of the field to treat would be uploaded to the plane's computer system.

Initially, according to Leonard, producers who use the prescription system will be able to cut input costs anywhere from 10 to 40 percent.

"If you have a field area that's yielding 250 pounds of cotton and the rest of the field is yielding 1200 pounds, why would you want to put the same level of inputs into an area where you're not going to make any money?" asked Leonard.

The principles can be applied with ground-based applicators, but irrigation and the frequent Louisiana rain hinder ground application much of the growing season.

"We think aerial application is here to stay and we need to develop these systems for aerial applicators," Leonard said.

The efforts of the Louisiana research team, comprised of Leonard, Bagwell, Dan Martin, Ken Paxton, Randy Price and Darryl Rester of the LSU AgCenter, Dale Magoun of the University of Louisiana-Monroe and pilot Edwards Barham have focused on pesticide application. The same techniques can be applied for fertilizer, herbicides and fungicides.

Littlefield named top vet

Dr. Martha Littlefield, assistant state veterinarian for the Department of Agriculture and Forestry, recently received the Dr. Ralph C. Cooper 2002 Veterinarian of the Year award from the Louisiana Veterinary Medical Association.

Littlefield said she is honored to have been selected Vet of the Year and will continue to work on the many programs she feels are important to veterinary medicine.

"Just because I've won this award doesn't mean I'm going to sit back and take it easy. This is not the end of my service to the animals, veterinarians, students and animal owners in the state," Littlefield noted.

"I plan to remain active in the rabies and heartworm awareness programs, the Peer Assistance Program, and emergency preparedness coordination for animal owners."

Littlefield is 21-year member of the LVMA and has been working for the department since June of 2002. She has also worked in private practice and as an instructor at the LSU School of Veterinary Medicine.

Time to vaccinate horses for multiple strains of encephalitis

State officials say it's time to vaccinate horses for optimum protection against West Nile virus and strains of equine encephalitis.

Assistant State Veterinarian Dr. Martha Littlefield said it's best to protect horses now before mosquito season.

"It's already been confirmed in the bird population this year, but before we start seeing mosquitoes, horse owners need to get things started and in Louisiana that means vaccinate early," Littlefield said.

She said horses should be vaccinated every year and even twice a year in some areas.

"Horse owners need to check with their local veterinarians to see what the protocol is for that area of the state," she said.

Littlefield also urged horse owners and local veterinarians to report any suspected cases of West Nile or encephalitis to the state's Office of Animal Health Services.

"It's a reportable disease. Don't just treat the disease without any blood work on the horse because we need better numbers on how it's spreading across the state," Littlefield said.

With 362 confirmed cases of equine West Nile in 2002, Louisiana had more instances of the disease than any other state in the Deep South.

Littlefield said documented cases of the disease are only a small portion of the cases that are actually out there.

"Virtually there were bunches of cases that went undetected because they weren't reported," she said.

Citing the public health hazard, Littlefield said equine West Nile virus statistics would help parish officials determine how best to control mosquito populations.

Littlefield said mosquito-borne eastern equine encephalitis, western equine encephalitis and West Nile virus are often fatal to the animals.

The West Nile virus is very hardy as it is able to overwinter in adult Culex mosquitoes that go into hibernation.

Littlefield said the peak of the equine West Nile virus season is generally late September and early October.

"But don't wait to vaccinate. Do it now before it's too late," she said.

Using an aerial image, the shape of Field 1 is identified (from left to right). Field 1 visual imagery indicates growth patterns in green and low-growth areas in light green. The final image clearly identifies the trouble spots in yellow. On-board GPS indicators allow aerial applicators to identify these same areas during flight so input adjustments can be made.
